These stories from before the millennium are about the everlasting state of the world, and how to make it a better-lasting place. They have a common thread, though they come in a variety of styles. Whether fable, street theater, therapy session, or generational dust-up, they involve transformations of consciousness assisted by encountering magic words. While I was working on a new novel, my college-age daughter asked whether I had ever written a childrens story. It occurred to me that in the distant past, I actually had. So I dug through all my old floppy discs and then back to paper manuscripts and found The Magic Word that I drafted in 1989 and copyrighted in 1990. Reading it over, I realized it was not really a childrens story, but a fable about saving the planet by practicing what most of us learned as children. On revisiting it after 23 years (as if it was written by some other entity), I was amazed by how sharply it reflected the political, economic and environmental circumstances that have manifested so blatantly today. I wondered whether I had written other stories that I had also forgotten and that were topically related. In digging deeper into dusty old boxes I had the rarefied experience of visiting more of my past as if written by another. It was like discovering a buried treasure just as hoped for: a treasure of never-published stories from the last century that would nicely complement The Magic Word. So here they are just as they were written. Nothing has been updated - no issues, no characters, no concerns, no structure. Presenting them this way offers a kick in the pants about how the same problems persist over time...
